Just then a car bore down from the east and the affrighted mother, hearing the gong darted after her son, who was in the center of the tracks. There was not a moment to spare, and dropping her parkages, she grabbed the little lesson by the shoulders. He fell in the street, unharmed. The mother was rendered unconscious, and in that condition was removed to the office of Doctor W. F. Francis, near by, where her injuries were at once pronounced to be serious, perhaps concussion of the brain. Her scalp was badly cut.

The little boy clung to the prostrate form of his mother, who at first was not identified, as she had recently changed her abode. The boy said something about living across the river, but it was finally learned through a former noighbor that his father worked across the river, being a teamster for the St. Louis Transfer Company.

The judgment was obtained in Justice Walker's court on September 5, 1901. She was shopping at the time of the Invasion and the Deputy and his men were packing up the dresses she wears in the Sultan of Sulta when her husband, Frank Moulan, appeared. After a long parley he induced Deputy Westerholt to walt until he could effect a compromise.

Moulan hastened downstairs and in the lobby of the hotel met Judge Richard A. Jones, Tams's attorney. He urged upon Judge Jones the importance of his wife having her gowns for the evening performance. After seeing Tams and holding a lengthy council a compromise was effected, the terms of which would not be made known.

Upon the arrival of Deputy Westerholt at the hotel he experienced difficulty in securing an entrance to the apartments. It was not until he displayed his writ and insisted upon executing it that Auditor De Young would consent to accompany him to the prime donne's rooms. Tams claims he was formerly Miss Ber-rl's manager. The money, he claims, was due him on a contract, entered into by Miss Berri when she was singing at Uhrig's Cave.

tured by disease," he went on, "fair and gentle women made the victims of outrage and brutality, strong men killed in thousands to gain a little additional gold, an extra slice of empire, then you see the tragic, the inexplicable, the crazy cruelty of putting into us this little pulse called Life. But I try not to think of this-it is

But of things temporal there shall be no duration-neither sovereignty, nor suprema-cy, nor power; only love, which makes the weak the strongest and governs the prou-est-and of things eternal we knew naugh save that love, always love, is still the cen ter of the universe, and that even to redeem the sins of the world God himself could find no surer way than through love, born of woman into life.

Governments emanate from social influ-ences. The social rule of the Roman Em-petors bred athletes, heroes and poets merely because physical strength and courage, combined with heroism and poetle perceptions, were encouraged by Roman so-ciety. The social rule of England's Elizabeth had its result in the brilliant attain ments of the many great men who crowded her court: the social rule of Victoria, until the death of the Prince Consort, hed gen-tle women and chivalrous men. In all these cases the reigning monarchs governed so-ciety, and society governed politics.

Politics, indeed, can scarcely be considered apart from society, because, on the nature and character of society depend the nature and character of politics. If society nature and character of politics. If society is made up of corrupt women and unprincipled men the spirit of political government will be as corrupt and unprincipled as they If any King, beholding such a state of things, were to suddenly cut himself clear of the corruption, and to make a straight road for his own progress—clean and core and elect to walk in it, society a straight road for his own progress—clean and open—and elect to walk in it, society would fellow his lead, and as a logical con-sequence politics would become honorable. But no monarchs have the courage of their opinions newadays; if only one soverign of them all possessed such courage, he could move the world.

BITTER STRUGGLE OVER RATES. Shipping and Railroad Interests at Chicago, Sept. 12.-Indications are that there will be a bitter struggle between the shipping and rallroad interests regarding the reduction of freight rates all over Illinois. Committees which were appointed some time ago by the State Railroad Commission, representing both shippers and railroads, have been unable to reach any agreement.

After an all-day session of the two committees to-day an indefinite adjournment was taken and both sides expressed the opinion that the courts of the State would have to settle the questions involved. The Shippers' Committee insists upon a horisontal reduction of Illinois tariffs amounting to fully 39 per cent, and this the railroad representatives have no idea of conkey style the aroused companions.

"We want that monkey out at the club," remarked Mr. Hawes. "We will call him Doctor Gabriel and install him as our mascot. The boys will understand."

The friend said that he would do his part and the monkey was purchased. He was sent out to the club yesterday afternoon, where he kept the attaches busy. Fortunately, Doctor Gabriel is warranted not te bite, no matter how fierce he may seem to be. It is hoped to put him on friendly terms with the entire membership within the next few weeks.
